Despite America's having a twice-elected black president and a growing number of black elected officials, there is a lag in black economic advancement. Join the LSU Reilly Center for Media & Public Affairs and the Eric Voegelin Institute as we host Wall Street Journal editorial board member and senior fellow at the Manhattan Institute, Jason Riley, to discuss why the political strategies of civil rights leaders often leave a large number of blacks behind in economic, social and political growth.